

I've been living in DC for four weeks now and I'm having the best time of my life. I really enjoy what I'm doing here. My office is great, my supervisor and the rest of the staffers are great. I enjoy the environment and how kind everyone really is. In the past few weeks I've gotten close to all my other coworkers and it's great because they're all from New York State and we talk about visiting each other when we're back in New York. I'm so glad I've made this connection with them. I really think I was very lucky to be placed at Senator Gillibrand's office! And it's funny because when I had my phone interview I thought it went so poorly and I thought I probably wasn't going to get that position. Of course, Miguel, a junior CAMP student, told me to not worry. He said that everything happens for a reason.

That is Kaitlyn, (on the left side) she goes to college an hour from where I attend college in Oneonta and we found out that we have a friend in common! Small world, huh

This weekend was Fourth of July and it was amazing. The CAMP interns and I attended the parade during the day then camped out at the Lincoln Memorial for a spot to watch the fireworks at night. We were also there with other interns and it was a really good time. It's days like these, where we all get together and just talk and laugh and not focus on our phones or social media, that makes me appreciate being in DC.
